INFORMATION ABOUT SEALING JUVENILE COURT RECORDS

For many cases, if you completed everything the judge required, the court automatically seals your juvenile criminal record when you turn 18, finish probation, or are released from custody (whichever happens last). Your record should be sealed without you having to do anything.

Violent offenses and drug offenses are not eligible to be sealed automatically. You must file a motion to ask the juvenile court judge to seal your record. You file your request with the same court where your case started. If your case was a sex offense, you need to file to be relieved from the duty to register as a sex offender before requesting your record to be sealed.

If you completed diversion, you have a confidential criminal history, which is different than a juvenile criminal record. Because of this, juvenile diversions are not automatically sealed, they are automatically destroyed when certain conditions are met (see table).

If your record is sealed, it might still be available to some people. Your sealed juvenile record may still show up on an FBI background check, which may be required for jobs related to working with children and vulnerable adults, law enforcement, the federal government, or the military. Your juvenile record can be unsealed if you are adjudicated or convicted of a new offense or charged with a felony as an adult.
