Bellevue, and most other cities in King County, have long contracted with the County for animal-related services. Historically, the County's Board of Appeals (Board) was the sole administrative tribunal with authority to hear appeals of Animal Services' enforcement actions.

Not surprisingly, when cities such as Bellevue crafted their pertinent city code sections, they referenced (or adopted County code sections referencing) the Board.

In 2016, we (the Examiner) replaced the Board as the sole County administrative tribunal with jurisdiction to hear Animal Services-related appeals. Any appeal filed with the Board after that point would have been a dead end, as the Board no longer had authority to hear any animal-related cases.

In 2017, Bellevue and King County executed an amended interlocal agreement that recognized us as the administrative tribunal for animal-related cases and required Bellevue to update its code to reflect the change. Bellevue, however, has not amended its code; the current version still designates the Board as the relevant tribunal.

We have been interpreting city code sections still referencing the Board as the city intending, essentially, “Instead of setting up a different appellate process, the city wants to use the County’s appeal process,” and not as, “The city singles out the Board as the only County tribunal the city wants hearing appeals, and if the Board can no longer entertain animal appeals, the city no longer wants the County hearing appeals.”

However, in Superior Court litigation stemming from an appeal to us of an Animal Services action from Bellevue, the court has disagreed. The court’s recent order determined that, until Bellevue amends its code, we (the Examiner) have no authority to adjudicate animal enforcement cases arising from Bellevue.

We thus DISMISS the pending appeal.

We do not know exactly where that leaves things here. Our dismissal is not a ruling on the merits, and it does not resolve anything about the July 11 events here. All we can say with certainty is that, until the Bellevue City Council amends its code, we have no jurisdiction over this or any other animal dispute arising from Bellevue.
